The daily play hour, if systematically utilized, always brings with it a delightful sense of anticipation. The mother slowly withdraws the cover to the little brown box, and the child finds apparently an old friend in the cube before him. Attempting to seize the block he is surprised to find its new characteristic. What was one block is now many, and a laugh of joy shows his delight at its altered form. His first impulse seems to be to put them in the box again, and trial after trial must be made before he succeeds in fitting the many into one. Opening and shutting the box and putting in and taking out the blocks gives great pleasure, and becomes gradually easier and easier until completely mastered. Another day the mother playfully puts one block on top of another, and gradually builds them all up, singing, meanwhile, at each succeeding step. Baby quickly knocks them down with a gurgling laugh and a request for more. Repeating this play for a time the mother finally suggests that the baby place one block while she places another, and cooperatively they build a tall, strong pole or tower. Taking the blocks down one by one, comes as a step in advance after knocking them down, and changing to long trains and walls also delights the baby and becomes an incentive for him to arrange and rearrange the blocks. Chairs, tables, houses, and many surrounding objects, are eventually made...
