Excerpt: .same wood, and a picture was let into each. The doors and the unglazed presses were more elaborately carved, the former being copies in walnut of the bronze doors of the cathedral at Pisa, the latter in some of the designs of the cedar ceiling in the library at Bologna. The whole was sumptuous, with crimson curtains and monuments of ormolu-- enough to make the heart of a rash intruder sink within him. It would be impossible to imagine a gang of English burglars entering this room suddenly and then persisting in the rifling of the mansion. It would need French revolutionaries to do the job. But the feeling of which Captain Dill was conscious on entering the room was not one of awe; it was more akin to a feeling of jealousy--a rebellious feeling against the disposition of affairs by Fate or Destiny--it was...
