Introduction This paper will deal with politeness distinctions in personal pronouns. Thus, the leading question will be: In how far can personal pronouns, being deictic expressions, serve as elements of politeness To clarify this a little more, I would like to begin with a short explanation of the term 'deictic expression': Deictics, also known as 'pointing words', are for example: I, you, here, there, before, after. One can distinguish between person, local and time deixis. Special to deictics is the fact that they are meaningless unless we know who speaks and thus forms the center of orientation - the origo . Personal pronouns, however, form a category of person deixis. They relate to either the addressee or to someone talked about in a conversation, they 'characterize the referent as well with respect to the speech act role and the size...'
